MOLLY THE MODEL

SMALL-WINGED COP

"AIR thieves, that's a new one."

The Inspector looked glum as he eyed the two airport officials sitting before his desk. "Got any idea where they've gone?"

One of the men said, "If we did we'd send someone out to find 'em."

"What am I supposed to do about it?" the Inspector demanded. "Rather out of my department, I'm thinking. However, let me think this over."

The two men rose and slapped on their hats. The interview hadn't been very enlightening.

"They got $100,000 in gold—payroll for the Indus Mine," one said.

The Inspector nodded. "So you said. Well, I'll do all I can."

The municipal airport at San Ramon was astir with excitement. Air thieves! It had a romantic sound. But it had cost the port—rather the insurance company—a lot of money. Two men in a small ship had landed just behind the big airliner. When the freight was being loaded into a truck, they drew guns and ordered the heavy box placed in their small plane.

"Never saw a little ship get off the ground so fast," one of the laborers at the field said. "Like a rocket job, only it wasn't."

"They ought to let us carry guns," said another worker grumblingly.

Another spat. "Yeah, so we could get our brains blasted out? Ya think them guys take any chances when they pull a stickup? I don't want no gun. Let 'em have th' gold, I say!"

The field boss scratched his head. "Of course," he ruminated, "it's no skin off our noses. Still, I hate to see muggs like that get away with a daylight robbery."

The newspapers were filled with the daring gold theft by two men in a small plane. The plane had disappeared after spiralling into the blue above San Ramon Airport.

And that was that.

Eric Vale didn't know the answer when he was called in on the case. They stole the gold, got away with it, and there you are.

"The insurance company will restore the loss to the mine," he told the Inspector.

The latter looked stern. "But that's not where the thing ends. The insurance people are on my neck every hour. Have you heard anything? Are you going to do anything?"

Eric nodded. He understood the Inspector's situation. The whole thing was so new that no one seemed to have any answer. Air thieves were about as plentiful as radium deposits.

The matter would have died out there if there had been no more raids on airports. Three weeks went by. The newspapers cooled down. The insurance company gave up in despair and paid the claim to the Indus Mine.

Then another bold theft occurred, this time a hundred miles to the north, at the Rockland Airport. A shipment of diamonds and valuable jewelry was stolen by the same two men in a small plane, in exactly the same manner. Again they got away.

Eric Vale brought his fast converted pursuit down on the Rockland field and taxied close to the main offices. The officials were waiting for him. They looked grim.

Eric grinned. "Happened again, eh?" he called. No answer.

The president of the line was there to greet him. He did, with: "They tell me you are the best air dick in the business. Well, what do you think about this?"

"Haven't had time yet," Eric told him. "There's only one answer as I see it—capture the guys responsible."

"Easier said than done," grumbled the prexy. "Police planes've been scouring the country. No soap. They disappear every time."

Eric took a drink of water from the iced cooler. "Then I guess it's up to me to find 'em."

No one answered for a moment. Then: "Just ask for anything or anybody you need," said the president.

"I want an Army dirigible," Eric told him.

"A—what!" gasped the man.

"Dirigible," returned Eric imperturbably. "Plane's no good for this kind of chase. I got to get up high and watch."

Eric got his dirigible and crew at the San Francisco base and that afternoon he was going on the first man-hunt of its kind ever heard of.

He had had installed in the ship several odd devices, among them an infra-red scanning machine. These had been used in bombing tactics and for seeing through fog, and in darkness. Eric planned a new use for the apparatus.

They kept going higher and higher. The crew began asking questions.

"I figure about 20,000 feet will about do the trick," Eric explained. "From that height we can see a good many miles in all directions."

At 23,000, Eric called a halt and ordered the engines shut off. The big ship idled. The air was fortunately still, so their drift was negligible. The hours passed. Sunset came. Then twilight. Eric kept his eyes at the scanning device, watching for every movement below. There was none.

None, that is, in which he was interested. Of course he could see many roads and highways and take in the traffic always present. Once he started as a silvery shape slid across his vision, far below. But he quickly saw that it was only a transcontinental airliner.

They were "anchored" high above a lofty mountain range of the Sierra Nevada's. Their vision-range was many miles in every direction.

"This," said Eric to himself, "is a nice spot for an atom bomb—if only the thieves show up."

But the thieves were not showing up. The hours passed. It was near midnight when Eric thought he saw a small dark streak pass over the viewing glass. He strained his eyes. Yes, it was the tiny plane, all right! But what the heck. There wasn't a thing he could do about it.

Would the thieves make a try for some loot at night? He doubted it. He ordered the engines cut in and they began drifting, following the spectre far below. They lost it after a half hour in the darkness of the rugged mountains. The lads must have an excellent hideaway, he thought, where they could land without lights.

Eric doubted that his dirigible had been discovered. The plane's motor noise would cover the slight rumble of the big ship's engines.

"Might as well go back and 'anchor' in the same spot," Eric told the engineer-pilot. "Maybe we'll get a chance tomorrow."

The night passed with Eric and then another young crew member constantly at the glass. They saw nothing out of the way.

Dawn came bright and golden, stabbing out of the east in long lances of flame.

And soon after dawn came the little plane they were searching for. It leaped out of a mountain crevasse and buzzed through the bright sunshine, apparently on its way to a new job.

The engines came to life. The big gas bag fell in behind. When, and if, the thieves pulled a "job," the dirigible would settle and machine guns would begin barking—after Eric had warned the men in the plane to land.

A half hour later the tiny plane had taxied to a stop in another airfield, and apparently made another spectacular robbery. It was soon in the air and buzzing toward its mountain hideaway.

Eric gave the word to drop down. And then a strange cloud loomed from the coast and came toward them. It grew bigger and darker, but kept fairly close to the ground. What it was nobody knew.

The little plane flew into it, was lost in its darkness. A moment later there was a bright flash clearly visible to everyone in the dirigible car. They were hardly 1000 feet above it. The small plane had smacked directly into the face of a mountain and exploded.

"Well, that ends the trail," Eric observed. "And what do you think did the trick?"

"No idea," replied the pilot. "Can't make it out. Can you?"

Eric nodded. "A swarm of butterflies!"
